Baghdad Without a Map - Tony Horwitz

Baghdad Without A Map is the first book by American journalist and writer, Tony Horwitz. This book describes Horwitz's experiences with the locals in various Middle East countries during his years there as a free-lance journalist. Horwitz accompanied his wife, Australian journalist and author, Geraldine Brooks when she took on the job of Middle East Correspondent for The Wall Street Journal ...

Baghdad Without A Map And Other Misadventures In Arabia ...

'Baghdad Without Maps' works on many different levels: The author shares with us something of his personal life and the development of his career, in a humorously self-deprecating tone. We learn something of the pack-mentality of war zone journalists, and we learn something of the countries he visits, with the occasional crash-course on a nation's history or political system. All too often ...

Baghdad Without a Map By Tony Horowitz | Used ...

Baghdad in the mid 1980s was such a volatile place to be. For Tony Horwitz to be bombing around (pun totally intended) Arabia was insane. There he was, in a land where even local weather reports and maps were banned. Think about it. As a left handed, Jewish stringer, he was not the most popular person to be wandering about those parts of the middle east. He met many people who exclaimed ...

Baghdad Without a Map was written right up to the beginning of the first war in Iraq. Without a doubt, it's an interesting perspective on how Tony Horwitz saw the Middle East before it changed into how we know/see it today. Over the past few years, I've developed an interest in books focusing on the Middle East/Asia regions, particularly now that they have figured so profoundly in all of ...
